
On the occasion of the 10th anniversary of the foundation of the Museum of Karaite History and Culture in Halicz, Ukraine, the local nature reserve “Davnij Galič” (Bygone Halicz) organised an international conference under the title Karaïmi ta ‘ih rol’ u kontekst svitovoï spîl’noti (Karaites and their role in the context of the global community), which took place on 17 September 2012 in this city. As in previous years, post-conference materials came out the same year. They were recommended for publishing by the scientific committee of the afore-mentioned nature reserve.

The reviewed publication consists of 16 short articles and informational texts about the culture and history of the Karaites from Russia and Ukraine. This volume begins with the article entitled Džerloznавčij analìz karaïms’kogo kolofonu (Source study on a Karaite colophon) by the late Professor Jaroslaw Daszkiewicz (1926–2010), a distinguished Ukrainian historian, and deputy director of the Lviv Ukrainian branch of the Institute of Archeology and Source Studies M.S. Hrushevsky. It is a reprint of the introductory part of his article entitled Danilo Romanovič i episkop Petro v osvìtlennì karaïms’kogo džerela (Daniel Romanovych and bishop Peter in the light of a Karaites source), which was published in the Ukrainian language not long ago. Presumably, the editors’ intention was for this article to raise the academic standard of the discussed collective work, which includes numerous trivial and fragmentary texts.

Three thematic groups can be distinguished among the articles written by living authors on topics connected with the history, culture and religion of the Karaites in Ukraine. As many as nine works about history are included in the discussed book, and thus history is most numerous represented. They articles are mainly of a general character on the history of the Karaites of Halicz, and do not bring anything new to historical research. This includes, among others, Nadiá Vasil’čuk’s Vulicá Karaïms’ka u mistì Galič (A Karaite street in the town of Halicz) (pp. 40–44), Svitlana Kukula’s Galic’ki karaïmi: živa istoriá (Rodina Novahovičiu) (The Halicz Karaites: a Living History. The Nowachowicz Family) (pp. 59–63), Pobuc’ka Lúbov’s Problemi zniknenná galič’kih karaïmiv (The Issue of the Extinction of the Halicz Karaites) (pp. 67–69), and Andrìj Čemerins’kij’s Kìl’ka štrihìv do istoriì gromadi karaïmiv u Galič (A Few Sketches on the History of the Karaite Community in Halicz) (pp. 83–91). From this collection, the article by Natalia V. Âblonovs’ka, Ph.D., a journalist and lecturer at Taurida National V.I. Vernadsky University, deserves more attention. Her short text was given the title Žurnal krims’kikh karaïmiv “Izvestiá Karaimskogo Duhovnogo Pravleniá” (1917–1919) (The Journal of the Crimean Karaites Izvestiá Karaimskogo Duhovnogo Pravleniá (1917–1919)) (pp. 13–16). “Izvestiá Karaimskogo Duhovnogo Pravleniá” (The News of the Karaites Spiritual Consistory), edited by Aron Ilicz Katyk, hazzan of the Karaite community in Feodosia, initially appeared under the title Izvestiá Tavričeskogo i Odesskogo Karaimskogo Duhovnogo Pravleniá (The News of the Taurida and Odessa Karaites Consistory) and constituted an official organ of the Karaites Spiritual Consistory. In her text on the periodical, N. V. Âblonovs’ka actually devoted only two paragraphs to the periodical.

1 I would like to thank Andrij Felonûk, Ph.D., for indicating this correlation. Ā. Daškevič, Danilo Romanovič i episkop Petro v osvìtlennì karaïms’kogo džerela, [in:] Ā. Daškevič, Postati: Narisi pro diâčov istoriì, politiki, kul’turi, 2nd edition, L’viv 2007 pp. 35–61.
itself, as she mainly dealt with all Karaite journals which appeared in Russia and Poland in the 20th century. This is a shame, as this subject is generally known, as this author and other scholars, including Úrij Babinov from the university in Sevastopol, have written about it previously.2

The text by Alexandr Azarievič Babadžan (hazzan from Simferopol) corresponds with the above-mentioned article. It is dedicated to the 175th anniversary of the Taurida and Odessa Karaite Spiritual Consistory (pp. 36–39), and includes a brief outline of the history of the institution from 1837 to 2001 on the basis of preserved sources from the state archive in Crimea and published documents.

By contrast, Petr Kaleta dealt with an unknown subject regarding interest in the Crimean Karaites in the Czech press and publications in the 19th century (pp. 17–23). It appears that some rudimentary information about Karaites appeared in Czech publications and encyclopaedias only after 1841, and mainly when the sights and the picturesque landscape of Crimea was being described. They were frequently treated as a Jewish sect, and Chufut-Kale was indicated as their main area of settlement.

Two biographical articles also deserve attention, i.e. one by Igor Koval’, Ph.D, Associate Professor of Vasyl Stefanyk Precarpathian National University, and another one by Viktor Dzevanovskij, an employee of the State Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg, Russia. The former describes the life and oeuvre of Roman Pašin (1938–2000), a specialist in regional and cultural studies and researcher of the history of the Halicz Karaites (pp. 24–30), whereas the latter focuses on the remnants of the valuable collection of Seraya M. Shapshal (1873–1961), held at the State Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg. The collection consists of 81 coins at the Numismatics Department, four chamails (khama’il)3 in the Department of the East (i.e. the Department of Archaeology of Eastern Europe and Siberia and the Oriental Department) of the same museum, and 20 rare manuscripts written in the following languages: Arabic, Persian, Turkish and Azerbaijani, which are at the Institute of Oriental Studies of the Russian Academy of Sciences.

In the book under review, four articles from the field of Karaite culture were published. The first, a very general one by G. O. Lebedëva, Ph.D., presents the culture of national minorities as a significant part of Ukrainian culture (pp. 31–35). In the second one, Galina Ostašuk noted the variety of Karaite proverbs and specific sayings (pp. 64–66); however, this subject had already been discussed in a number of works by scholars of great esteem, such as Seraya M. Shapshal, Professor Tadeusz Kowalski, and Professor Ananiasz Zajączkowski. Ároslav Potašník also dealt with the peculiarities of Karaite ethnography in his text (pp. 76–82), in which he pointed out its eclectic nature and numerous borrowings from other cultures. The author elaborated on the Karaite coat of arms, language, anthroponomy, customs and holidays. In addition, Hristina Basovs'ka discusses decorative motives and epitaphs on Karaite tombstones of the cemetery in Halicz (pp. 92–98), a subject discussed earlier in the catalogue of these tombstones published in 2000.4

Finally, the last two articles included in the discussed book must be presented. They refer to questions of a religious nature. In his article (pp. 51–58), Êvgen Kramar took notice of the Karaites’ origins, the etymology of the name, compared the Karaite religion to the Jewish one and briefly discussed the history and the demographic data of the Karaites while attempting to answer the question “who are the Karaites?” In the last article, A. Û. Polkanova described religious ideas in the anthroponyms of the Crimean Karaites (pp. 70–75).

In conclusion, it must be stated that the commemorative book Karaïmi ta ih rol’ u kontekst svìtovoï spìl’noti does not claim a right to being fully exploratory or setting new directions of research in the field of history and culture of the Karaites in Ukraine, yet it is a significant work in terms of the popularisation of the subject matter, which may reach many members of the lay audience interested in the history of national religious minorities in Eastern Europe.
